De Kooning’s well-known Woman series, begun in 1950 and culminating in Woman VI, owes much to Picasso, not least in the aggressive, penetrative breaking apart of the figure, and the spaces around it. Picasso’s late works show signs that he, in turn, saw images of works by Pollock and de Kooning. 17 de Kooning led the 1950s art world into a new movement known as American abstract expressionism.

De Kooning, Willem | Woman V Willem de Kooning's first paintings of female figures were made in 1940, some of them inspired by Elaine Fried, who he would later marry. [1] These early works show the contorted poses, folded limbs, clasped hands and, occasionally, exaggerated eyes, mouths and breasts later adopted for his extended series, but are generally more serene, both in paint-handling and in overall mood.

Untitled XI | The Art Institute of Chicago Willem de Kooning is known for emotive, gestural canvases that transcend conventional definitions of figuration and abstraction. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, he turned his attention away from painting, instead focusing on sculpture, printmaking, and drawing. In 1975, at the age of 71, de Kooning began one of the most productive periods of painting in his career, quickly completing 20 new, large canvases within 6 months.

"The Tree of Fluids," Jean Dubuffet, 1950 | Tate In April 1950 the French artist Jean Dubuffet embarked on a series of paintings entitled Corps de Dames or 'ladies' bodies'. The distortion of the female body in these paintings - it appeared as if flattened by a steamroller, with sexual parts laid bare - has led some commentators to compare Dubuffet's work to the contemporaneous series of woman paintings by the Dutch-American painter Willem.
